As Joomla is getting more popular, more developers start putting eyes on it. Started in 2005 as a fork of Mambo, Joomla has transformed into a successful open source CMS within two years, with thousands of user base. The community grows up, getting bigger everyday. More third party developers put their contribution to joomla.

I can't resist the temptation not to look at Joomla. Previously I had experience with Mambo, though it was not so extensive. However, I consider Joomla has bright future, mainly for its continuous development and large user base. As a featured application in Google Summer Code 2006, Joomla may bring what common user expects from a CMS, ease of use, flexibility, and dynamic community for sharing.

This site is dedicated as a showcase for my joomla work. It includes modification/hacks I've made to Joomla core, components, and modules. Some work is intended as open source and free for download. The other may not and can have different copyright.

Feel fre to browse, read, and share the stuff you get from this site. However, please pay attention to the license and copyright. For custom work with custom license and non GPL copyright, please contact me if you're interested in getting them featured or implemented on your site.

Editor's note:

Content here is intended for Joomla 1.0.x. The most recent Joomla 1.5 is incompatible and different in many ways with the old version. Please be aware about this.
